

Abstract

This paper considers how we distinguish between authoritarian and critical societies. The critical tradition is characterized by a negative attitude toward surreptitious changes. A society may therefore be called critical if it is alert to any surreptitious changes. Is this the case with Japanese society?